Tools of good governance

While dealing with the problem of corruption, it is seen that the positive approach is more effective than a negative one that condemns the holders of power by stigmatizing them with the disapprobation which puts all in the same bracket thus both negating the reality of the existence of the good and creating a defensive wall around the bureaucracy that then defies all change by defending the status quo. Therefore, rather than censuring, it is better to find a remedy that works. Vilification only without seeking a remedy is worse than inaction. Secondly, there is an indirect correlation between corruption and good governance. In fact, corruption is a symptom of the crackling system that appears to have broken down with none making an effort to repair it. The presence of corruption is a sure indication of loose governance that permits aberrations. However, there is a positive correlation between good governance and development and protection of rights. It is an antidote to corruption.

It is in this context that a serious effort has to be made in seeking good administration. This propels search for tools that have worked and, if pursued conscientiously, would deliver, though slowly. This can be done by only those who have the power to bring about change.

Some of the effective tools are the Integrity Pact adopted by 51 public sector undertakings who have committed to principles of integrity, transparency, and fair play in procurements to the satisfaction of all stakeholders. Use of technology, wherever feasible, shall not only expedite the delivery of service but also eliminate the middlemen who have been exploiting the illiterate, the depressed, and the impoverished people, besides reducing the contact with the service provider. The social audit mandated by law under the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act has exposed wrong doing and manipulation. Similarly, independent studies help in showing a mirror to the administration about the leakages and inadequacies as well as solutions to problems. This is supplemented by the citizens’ card that conveys the perception of people about response of government.

Though the Right to Information Act is designed to help any citizen to seek information from public authorities, yet Section 4 of the Act that mandates the department to provide suo motu information has unintended consequences in making the agency to consider this as a check list and fill in the gaps. All that a department of the government is expected to do is contained in this law. The section itself is a storehouse of dos that no agency should ignore. This alone would raise the level of performance of public officials.

The civil society must continue to seek electoral reforms, forfeiture of property of corrupt public servants facing investigation and trial so that the proceeds of ill wealth are not alienated in the meantime. It must also sensitize the bureaucracy about their role and their potentials to deliver. It can also convince private sector to pledge and follow rules of integrity. The insistence upon ethical curriculum in educational institutions and using the tool of public interest litigation are instruments available in its arsenal.

All this must be proposed, propagated, and pursued in the interest of good governance.
