Neglected areas of corruption

The popular belief of corruption is only in terms of exchange of money when someone who needs a service pays to someone who provides it. Often the term is used for those who are in public positions of the state that confers upon them powers under law. Hence the expression of 'corrupt official' or 'corrupt politician'. The latter secures benefits either for himself or others through the use of public authorities by means of influence or proximity that he wields over the system. So there are two features – power and money.

Whereas accept of money concept is the most prevalent, others are equally important and must not be lost sight of. Although there is neither misuse of power nor exchange of money, yet these forms have a deleterious impact upon outcomes. In this category would fall the inefficient public official who does not contribute to the tasks because of his incompetence. This would also include a lethargic official who is indifferent to the outcomes and has no compunction in letting the matters lie dormant. He is also the one who is cruel with the resources of public and does not feel the pinch by diverting these to an infructuous use. He is profligate in spending without regard to its utility. One of the aspects of corruption is when the official absents himself from duty, like a teacher in a rural area who has a casual proxy working for him, or a health worker who draws a salary without any contribution.

He too is corrupt who is negligent in performing his work, is unresponsive to the needs of people whom he is designed to serve. But no less corrupt is a law enforcement officer who under performs and permits impunity and lawlessness because he is unaware of happenings around. Similarly, he who does not supervise the work contributes to tampering with quality of work. And, lastly, he may, due to lethargy, absenteeism or inefficiency, delay the projects that result in escalation of costs, benefit to the contractor, and loss to public exchequer.

In all these cases, the public official may not accept money to show favors, but by not doing his work and not using his powers for which he is paid, he indulges in a corrupt practice for his personal benefit. However, in a different manner, this perspective on corruption too involves features of power and money as the official draws his salary without contributing and using his powers.

The warriors against corruption also need to focus on these aspects.
